China's Social Credit System aims to give credibility scores to each of its citizens to measure "trustworthiness" in society.

"Under the system, financial behavior such as failing to pay a credit card bill or frivolous spending and bad behavior such as boarding a train without a ticket, can result in serious consequences.

Penalties include curbs on taking flights, trains, employment and educational opportunities, but it also seeks to reward people with high scores. For instance, people with a good credit record are able to get discounts on utility bills and faster application processes for travel abroad, depending on rules established by various local authorities."
